

ABSTRACT

A method and apparatus for determining a critical current of a conductor at least including superconducting material conveys the conductor in a superconducting state through a varying external magnetic field. A part of at least a first contact-free measurement of a magnetic field that results from influence of the external magnetic field on the conductor that is out of phase with the external magnetic field is determined for determining the critical current of the conductor.